Campus Enrollment Sets Record for Second Semester

More Than 32,000 Students Attending Northridge Campus, Up 10 Percent Over Last Year

For the second consecutive semester, Cal State Northridge's enrollment has reached a record high in the 44-year history of the campus, with more than 32,000 students taking classes this fall.

With still one more week until the official fall enrollment is tallied, the university already has enrolled 32,506 students, a gain of 10 percent and nearly 3,000 students compared to the 29,518 headcount (Northridge-only) the same time a year ago. The final fall headcount is likely to rise even higher during the coming week.

CSUN last set an enrollment record in spring 2002 with an official headcount of 31,681. That this fall's enrollment has grown even larger is even more amazing because the university this semester stopped counting students enrolled in its Channel Islands program because their numbers shifted to the new CSU Channel Islands campus.

In another extraordinary indicator of the campus' growth and progress during the past decade, this fall's enrollment means the university has grown by nearly 34 percent, or about 8,200 students, since the low of 24,310 students reached in fall 1994 after the Northridge earthquake.

"It's an indication that we're becoming a destination campus," said Louanne Kennedy, CSUN's provost and vice president of academic affairs. But the provost also said it has been a challenge trying to get so many students into a limited number of classes.
"The classroom situation is tight," Kennedy said. "We're doing everything we can to accommodate the students. We're even offering classes in conference rooms. If there's a space available, we're going to use it." This fall, the university is offering 5,347 course sections, including 3,416 lecture-type sections.

Kennedy said the university's classrooms and lecture halls are almost full from 7 a.m. to 10 p.m. every day. The university also offers classes on Saturdays and Sundays to meet the demand. Across the campus, the university has more than 200 lecture classrooms.

During the summer, Kennedy said campus officials poured over CSUN's already-tight budget and transferred about $400,000 from other projects to academic programs just to accommodate the growth in students.

In her annual convocation address earlier this month, CSUN President Jolene Koester called it "a very difficult balancing act" for the university to manage its enrollment to not go too far beyond available budget resources, while also maintaining the campus' strong commitment to access for higher education.

The president last May appointed an Enrollment Policy Group of campus leaders headed by Assistant Vice President for Student Life William Watkins to offer policy recommendations on how the university can manage its twin values of access and quality without compromising either.

While awaiting the policy group's recommendations, the university has already had to take some actions to manage its enrollment, particularly in an environment where state budget deficits and resulting cuts have limited new state funds available to the campus and the rest of the Cal State system.

For the spring 2003 semester, when new student applications are relatively light compared to the fall, CSUN is not admitting first-time freshmen, lower-division transfers or those seeking postbaccalaureate studies or second bachelor's degrees. CSUN accepted upper-division transfer applications for the spring only during the initial filing period in August.

Margaret Fieweger, associate vice president for undergraduate studies, said in some ways, the high enrollment at Northridge is "a testament to the quality of education we offer at Cal State Northridge."

Kennedy also said she has been impressed with the patience of students and of the staff and faculty, many of whom are taking on more students than they originally thought they would have in their classes.

"For some faculty, this has meant completely redesigning their class plans," Kennedy said. "Everyone has done a great job of maintaining morale and goodwill throughout it all. For that, I am grateful. And it probably explains in part why we're becoming a destination university. It's the caliber of our faculty and students."
Northridge Chosen to Help Afghani Government Women

CSUN One of Four U.S. Universities Selected to Host Visiting Afghani Delegations for Specialized Training

Cal State Northridge has been chosen as one of only four universities in the nation to host a visiting delegation of women officials from Afghanistan's new government, providing a specialized two-week training program to help the women gain the skills needed to begin rebuilding their war-torn country.

Through its College of Extended Learning, CSUN is scheduled to host a five-member delegation of Afghani women—none of whom has ever been to the West—starting Monday, September 30. The visit is being arranged by the U.S. State Department and coordinated locally by the International Visitors Council of Los Angeles.

The five Afghani women—all mid-level government officials in their 20s and 30s—will spend their weekday mornings for two weeks from September 30 through October 11 improving their English and computer skills in a CSUN computer lab, mainly learning how to research and write grant proposals that Afghanistan must prepare to speed much-needed international aid.

"This is a once in a lifetime chance for us to help a nation and its women who have been so suppressed," said Simin Bahmanyar, the College of Extended Learning program development director who will oversee the women's instructional program. "If they can go back with something they learn here and put it to use, then we've accomplished our mission."
Along with the women coming to Cal State Northridge, another five-member group will receive training at Metropolitan State College and the University of Colorado-Denver in Denver, while a four-member group will study at Kennesaw State University in Atlanta. With other stops before and after, the 14 women are due to stay a month in the United States.

"This is a terrific opportunity for Cal State Northridge because we are committed to strengthening our connections with the community, whether here at home or abroad," said CSUN President Jolene Koester. "We already are a very diverse campus with many international students. But I think these kinds of exchanges teach us as much as we teach our guests."

The visit is one sign of the slow but steady reemergence of women in Afghanistan public life after five years of repression under the now toppled Taliban regime. During the Taliban era, most Afghani women could not hold jobs outside the home, were forbidden from leaving home without a male relative and were denied education, much medical care and other essentials.

With the November 2001 defeat of the Taliban, the U.S. government has made a top priority of helping Afghans begin to rebuild their country, which has been ravaged by decades of civil strife and war. And because of the extraordinary repression the Taliban imposed on women, the U.S. is giving special attention to helping restore their place in Afghani society.

CSUN was chosen for the historic program because of President Koester, who has a longstanding interest in international education and exchange. Koester was one of 36 women university presidents and chancellors who personally sponsored a full-page ad last February in the New York Times supporting women's rights, including education, in post-war Afghanistan.

The presidents and chancellors each head campuses that are part of the American Association of State Colleges and Universities (AASCU). So when the U.S. State Department subsequently asked AASCU to help develop the training program, seeking out universities in major urban areas, AASCU contacted President Koester.

While at CSUN, the five Afghani women will spend their mornings being taught by a rotating team of five instructors headed by Bahmanyar. In the afternoons and on weekends, they will meet with government and private groups, tour museums and tourist spots, and make a noon presentation on Wednesday, October 9 to the World Affairs Council downtown.

The Afghani women slated to come to CSUN are Masooda Barekzaie, a staff member in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs; Marzia Bazul, a judge in the Kabul Public Security Court; Jina Haidari, director of cooperatives, and Wilda Rustaie, a secretary in the Ministry of Women's Affairs, and Breshna Sadat, another staff member in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Bob Brocklehurst, associate dean of CSUN's College of Extended Learning and the campus' coordinator for the visit, predicted the women will be dramatically influenced by their exposure to Western society. "Our team of instructors is prepared to coach them through a comprehensive classroom learning experience while also nurturing and encouraging their exploration of the Los Angeles community," Brocklehurst said.

Since CSUN first learned last May of the possibility of the Afghani visit, Brocklehurst said countless members of the university community have offered to help with the visit or share expertise with the women, far more than they will have time for. Nonetheless, CSUN officials hope the two weeks will be the beginning of an ongoing relationship with the five women.

CSUN's College of Extended Learning offers various educational programs to those who want to take a wide range of classes and training programs without going through the university admissions process. The college last year had nearly 12,000 students enrolled, in addition to the university's 32,000 admitted students, said Dean Joyce Feucht-Haviar.

A successful visit by the Afghanistan delegation also could open the doors to new opportunities for international partnerships involving the university.

"Each time the university is responsive and successful with a particular group, it broadens our connections with new communities and wins friends for the university who may seek our help for other projects in the future," Feucht-Haviar said.

Afghanistan Culture Presentation

To prepare for the upcoming campus visit, CSUN Vice President for Administration and Finance Mohammad "Mo" Qayoumi will speak on the culture of Afghanistan. The event will be held at 1:30 p.m. Tuesday, September 24, in the Northridge Center of the University Student Union. Those planning to attend should RSVP to Andrea Henderson at x2270 or andrea.j.henderson@csun.edu.
Back to School Facts and Figures for the Nation

Rewards of Staying in School

$4.4 million is the estimated lifetime earnings of professional degree holders in 1999 dollars. This compares with $3.4 million for those with doctoral degrees, $2.5 million for master's degree-holders, $2.1 million for those with a bachelor's, $1.2 million for high school graduates and $1 million for high school dropouts.

$50,367 is the average starting salary offer in 2000 for bachelor's degree candidates in petroleum engineering, among the highest of any field of study. At the other end of the range, those majoring in the social sciences (excluding economics) were offered an average of $30,933.

Graduation

80 percent is the share of the nation's adults 25 and older with at least a high school diploma in Census 2000. The corresponding rate in the 1990 Census was 75 percent.

24 percent is the share of the nation's adults 25 and older with at least a bachelor's degree in Census 2000. The corresponding rate in the 1990 Census was 20 percent.

Cost of College

$8,912 is the average amount charged for tuition, room and board for in-state students at the nation's four-year public colleges and universities during 1999-2000.

$26,532 is the average charged for tuition, room and board at the nation's four-year private colleges and universities during 1999-2000.

Teachers

6.3 million is the number of U.S. teachers, from pre-kindergarten to college, as of 2000.

$52,200 is the average salary paid to public school teachers in New Jersey for 1999-2000, the highest of any state in the nation. The national average was $41,700.

Students
76.6 million is the number of U.S. residents enrolled in school—from nursery school to college—on Census Day, April 1, 2000. Students account for more than one in four of all U.S. residents.

49 million is the number of students enrolled in elementary and high school in October 2000, which matched the previous record set in 1970 when "baby boom" children expanded school enrollments.

10 million is the number of traditional college-age students (those under 25) in October 2000.

6 million is the number of students age 25 and older enrolled in college in October 2000. These older students accounted for 37 percent of all college students.

56 percent is the share of women college students in October 2000. Thus women maintained the majority status they have held since 1979.
